The royal sisters had another pleasant excursion together on the day following their inspection of the galleries. This time, however, they were accompanied by a sulte considerable in number, composed of two or three ambassadors and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting on their majesties. The whole party motored to Hatfield House, the historic residence of the Marquis of Salisbury, where Queen Elizabeth passed her childhood, and where there are so many mementos of the girthood and life of the virgin queen. After luncheon, which was served in the marble hall, a stately apartment with superb oak paneling and old Spanish tapestries, the Queen and Empress made a tour of inspection of the art treasures of this wonderful mansion.
